Bajirao Mastani is an epic love story between the ferocious Maratha general Bajirao and his second wife Mastani, a warrior princess, and the many obstacles they overcome. The hymn remained in a single copy, and it was lost. Another great jewel in the crown of knowledge about the King of Bhutan is the track The Culture of Schools of Dudjomocracy by Zahan Mandong, Professor of English Literature in Bangkok. His work was written in 2004 and is currently the most comprehensive collection of texts on the history and culture of Bhutan intended for study at school. The book is of equal interest to both schoolchildren and their teachers as it details the traditional life of the Nepalese and their relationship to religion, thus allowing the teacher to use all the cultural resources that can effectively prepare for schooling, says Mandong. However, as a Buddhist, Mandong emphasizes that his foundation is cultural heritage, not historical heritage. Following a traditional upbringing, the follower of the Buddha Shakyamuni took as the first rule the rules of conduct in most Buddhist monasteries: "Never look at a woman, even if there is no one around, and do not let her look at you." According to one of his rules: "If someone hits you, hit back." According to another: "You must know how to conduct a roll call." Although Bhutan is not a monarchy, the king is the highest official in the state. In 1982, he received the Nobel Peace Prize along with Soviet President Mikhail Gorbachev. His contemporaries called him the legendary king for his virtue, and the Tibetans for his wisdom and the wisdom of his ancestors. After the death of his father, guru Arunghadra, in 1955, his eldest son, Dakshin Kumar Singh, became king from 1955 to 1981. The new king, Prachanda Tusi, was an authoritarian and conservative monarch. However, after decades of ruling based on traditional values, including Buddhism, and demands to protect nature, King Prachandi began to look for ways to change. In 1961, King Prasundi issued a decree for the construction of numerous ecotrail facilities reflecting the cultural values of Bhutan. Odie
