It requires little configuration and its straightforward functions make it highly accessible for a broad range of users. The Federal Communications Commission is launching an investigation into Comcast's conduct in its Xfinity X1 set-top box. In a letter to Comcast chief executive Brian Roberts, chairman Tom Wheeler demanded information on the company's conduct in the development and marketing of the device.

ADVERTISEMENT "Over the past several months, I have become increasingly concerned that Comcast, through Xfinity X1, may have engaged in anti-competitive behavior," Wheeler wrote. Comcast has faced a backlash after it launched the box last year to replace traditional set-top boxes. Customers complained about its complexity and high price. The company's most recent public statement on the matter was a letter sent in January to a group of senators, in which Comcast said that it worked closely with lawmakers on the issue and that there is "no evidence" of anti-competitive behavior. The letter also promised to "act promptly" if customers asked for refunds on their purchases. Two Democratic lawmakers have called on the FCC to launch an investigation of Comcast's behavior. Rep. Anna Eshoo (D-Calif.) has signed on to a letter from Rep. Joe Barton (R-Texas) that asks the FCC to review the Xfinity X1 launch and determine whether there was market harm. The FCC could launch an investigation into Comcast's Xfinity X1 without its approval, but it normally only proceeds with a congressional investigation if it is referred to it by lawmakers. Rep. Mike Doyle (D-Pa.) has also signed on to a letter from Barton that asks the FCC to look into the matter. In a conference call with reporters on Wednesday, Doyle said he wants to determine if Comcast has a monopoly over cable television. "The notion that a monopolistic company was able to charge so much money for what is essentially a replacement for a commodity service, with no apparent competitive benefits, has us concerned," he said. Wheeler said in his letter that he wanted information on Comcast's Xfinity X1 launch, whether the company worked with customers to decide how to market the device and if Comcast had any exclusive licensing deals. "I ask for a response by April 10, 2013," Wheeler wrote. "If you fail to provide this information, the Commission may consider seeking it through appropriate means, including administrative and enforcement action." Comcast did not immediately respond to a request for comment. very kind to me." "Well, I
