When you reboot your computer, you probably try to do so without making any changes to your system. However, nowadays reboot almost always involves computer time, power and data transfer which can be costly. In the past, if you rebooted your computer (both in terms of stopping it and starting it again), the time taken to do so was minimized since it was usually a manual operation. It was not uncommon to use computers for months on end without ever shutting them down fully because there would be some activity and the computer would not be powered off. However, time is money and so there came the need for a reboot button, which is called the 'Shut Down' button. Two weeks ago, the people at Serato decided to put an end to that by making MXDown Activation Code. Specifically, MXDown functions in one of three ways: By Date/Time trigger, by attaching to a process and waiting for the process to exit or by attaching to a process and waiting for the process to complete its tasks though not necessarily exiting. This range of functionality allows you to have MXDown perform any of its available commands on your computer either on a specific time or when a task is complete. Let's say for instance that you use Nero to burn DVD movies. This process takes quite a while, often having people go to bed while the computer is processing this task.
