The function is defined as: `function get-account { param([string]$account) $return = @{} $return.account = $account $return }` The other function just doesn't seem to read the parameter at all: `$account = get-account if ($account) { echo "Account: $account" }` The $account variable is never set. How can I get PowerShell to pass the variable to the function? A: Try this: `function get-account { [cmdletbinding()] param([parameter(Position=0,ValueFromPipeline=$true)] [string]$account) $account }` And then call the script with this: `get-account -account'string1' -account'string2'` And as indicated by @sergio's comment, this will use the first account on the pipeline or the second. A: My fault, the

Edgar Allan Poe (March 16, 1809 – October 7, 1849) was an American writer and poet noted for his dark, sometimes macabre style and often highly original tales. He is remembered especially for his macabre tales of terror, such as "The Tell-Tale Heart," "The Masque of the Red Death," and "The Cask of Amontillado". To any reader of Poe's work, the image of the black cat prowling by the unconscious narrator of "The Tell-Tale Heart," or gliding on silent paws through the darkness of "The Raven," must immediately evoke the poet himself, stalking the streets of Philadelphia in the winter darkness of his later years, looking for victims to prey upon. He became only too recognizable in his last days, the "broken-spirited, hollow-eyed veteran of many an age," as he waited to die, a victim of his own imagination, and a final victim of alcoholism. Musical analysis of Edgar Allan Poe's verse was first studied by Joseph A. Wallingford in 1908, who is also credited with developing the rapid-fire style of analysis that many jazz fans were familiar with by the early 1920s.[1] Another researcher, Percy Bysshe Shelley, has said that "Poe, as poet, anticipated the extreme rapidity of speech that would become a standard of Black speech in jazz.[2] The tempo and style of beat changes in Poe's poetry, in relation to the subject matter, have historically been a subject of study in musicology. Some analysis of Poe's work was pioneered by Wallingford, who wrote that "The musical beat of a poem [is] inseparable from the expressiveness of a given poem." [3] The rhythmic flow and composition of his poems has given them a very distinctive ambiance and feel. While most of Poe's poems are written in a more traditional rhymed structure and form (see ballad verse), they also feature a unique architecture of rhythm and stress, where internal repetition of stress is used to characterize the internal structure of the poem. To describe a line of poetry as "very, very,
