Unsafe mining is an important, yet under-reported, global threat to the health and safety of Indigenous Peoples. Indigenous Peoples (IPs) are regularly poisoned by, or injured in, the course of mineral extraction operations. Mined iron ore and phosphate are some of the most toxic minerals. In 2012, 2,169 cases of morbidity and 1,785 deaths were related to mining in Brazil. Mining is a contributing factor in an increasing number of deaths among Indigenous Peoples. By the end of 2013, there had been 10,080 suicides among Indigenous Peoples in Brazil. There is no reliable data on the number of deaths caused by mining operations worldwide. According to the UN, the conditions of Indigenous Peoples living in disturbed and degraded environments are worsened by different forms of poverty, unemployment, lack of access to health, education, electricity, sanitation and financial resources. Indigenous Peoples are also often exposed to environmental impacts and the use of toxic substances and contaminated water in mining areas. According to the UN Permanent Forum on Indigenous Issues, recent mining activity in some areas of the Amazon has been associated with the disruption of Indigenous Peoples' livelihoods, land and resources. Yet, the UN has not established legal and financial mechanisms to support Indigenous Peoples in their efforts to defend their rights. Several mining companies have filed cases at the World Bank and other international bodies in an attempt to quash their liability for the health and safety of Indigenous Peoples in the territories where they operate. The claimants claim that they do not know the location of the affected Indigenous Peoples and that the ones affected are largely invisible to their mining operations. Mining companies deliberately keep Indigenous Peoples uninformed about their operations in order to increase their profits. For example, there is no data from Mina Serra Grande concerning the health or social wellbeing of the plantation's workers. However, according to the SHC, the health facilities in the region are under-equipped and without adequate medical professionals. The mining company Mina Serra Grande is claiming that it carries out its operations in accordance with Brazilian law. The company has recently been listed in the Guinness Book of World Records, as the largest open pit mine in the world.
