Users will have the ability to customize the "Player Impact Engine" (PIE) technology (defined below) to their preferred settings for the match on June 14th, while FIFA will test the advanced motion capture technology in the companion video player, FIFA TV, on June 15th. FIFA TV will offer users the opportunity to watch and share new matches generated by the use of PIE. "We've worked closely with our development teams to perfect the application of PIE to deliver a football game that is more closely aligned with the input data we collect from real-life players in motion capture suits," said Ian Atkins, Senior Producer at EA Sports. "We've created a unique blend of animation, physics and AI to give our footballers more intelligent, visceral on-ball behaviour, and the ability to counter-attack and exploit space from more authentic play. We're very excited to bring this new way of playing the game to fans." FIFA is being developed by Peter McCabe and takes advantage of the advances in motion capture technologies to let players relive the feeling of playing in a real match, even in a variety of weather conditions. Players are able to experience the dizzying speed of the game-world, the authentic movement of the ball and the dramatic effect of the crowd. They can not only push and pull off the myriad of players on the pitch, but they can actually feel the weight of every tackle, and the way that players spring off the ground, leap over a defender and head into the area where they can score. The Motion Capturing Player (MCP) technology has allowed EA Sports to capture high-speed real-world player movement and turn it into an interactive game experience. This includes the way players move, turn, change direction and bounce off the ball, with authentic player-body motion, in a variety of weather conditions and in the flow of a match. The data collected from players is analysed to give the player better on-field awareness and control. The on-field awareness consists of things like understanding when a defence is about to break free, where the best time to attack is and when to change the momentum of a game. The on-field control consists of things like being able to change direction quickly, know when a defender is dragging the ball out of play and identify when a team is about to counter-attack. "The game is the first to be played with motion capture that can be used to render animation that
