What is "Last Command" about?

The game revolves around the new idea of a 'last command'. You command your robot's movements and positioning and you can even name it. You are also able to use power ups to help you. All this in an extremely challenging environment.

How many levels does Last Command contain?

You can expect to play 16-20 different levels with many different obstacles.

What are power ups?

A power up is basically anything that you can use to help you. Some examples of power ups are the items an archer, the shotgun and armour. You can use them over and over again.

How do the power up feature work?

The archer can take 3 shots to kill a walled off robot. If you shoot one robot with the archer and it takes out 3 robots, you will get 1 point. But if you shoot 3 robots with the same robot, you will get 3 points. So that is how the power up feature works. They shoot robots in groups or single at a time and you gain points when it is your turn to use them.

How do I get points?

You get points for killing robots during your turn or for hitting robots with power ups. There is also 100 points for going through all of the levels on the first attempt and an additional 200 points for beating the game.

What are the controls like?

You can control the robots position and movement via keyboard or the 6 default buttons. You also have the power ups to use. An example is the archer. You can point the robot using your keyboard and aim it with your mouse. The arrow keys and mouse wheel are also used.

: ;rm -rf targetDirectory What is this last line meant for? It doesn't do anything, and the files are still there. A: If you attempt to remove a directory that is in use or that is the current working directory, rmdir will either: fail (return no error); or prevent you from attempting to remove further items from the directory. To remove a directory that you do not wish to prevent accessing or that is not in use, drop the -r (recursive) option, and be sure to start at the directory root. Like so: $ rmdir targetDirectory This should remove the directory and everything in it, even if it's in use (I'm pretty sure, but am happy to be corrected here on SO).
