Corrosion is a universal phenomenon, occurring in all environments that water may enter, such as the interior of a tank, a pipe, and a pipeline. The two main causes of corrosion are electrochemical reactions in the presence of water and mechanical or physical forces acting on the metal causing physical changes to the metal. These physical changes to the metal may occur by the corrosive agent, such as water, dissolving the metal or by the corrosive medium physically damaging the metal. Two important causes of physical damage to the metal are oxidation and pitting. Current iron pipe and metal water supply systems for commercial and residential use are susceptible to corrosion. There is a need for corrosion control for these systems. One method of corrosion control is cathodic protection which is a method of reducing corrosion by making the metal surface an anode. Cathodic protection is achieved using a combination of materials to form what is known as a liner. The anodes are installed on the outer surface of the liner and are in direct contact with the surrounding fluid or gaseous environment. When an electrochemical reaction occurs in the presence of water, the naturally occurring corrosion of a metal is reduced or eliminated by transferring the electrons from the anode to the cathode. There are two types of cathodic protection systems: passive cathodic protection and active cathodic protection. The passive system provides cathodic protection simply by placing an anode which is the source of the electrons in the system. The active system adds further protection by using a gas to conduct electricity. In the active system the current is conducted by a gaseous medium which allows the anode to be placed in contact with the surrounding liquid or gas. Cathodic protection devices have to operate reliably for extended periods of time while maintaining the integrity of the electrical contact between the anode and the pipe to which the anode is attached. Examples of the function of a cath

I have the same feeling, D*ck. PEDs for the first time. PEDs may not be associated with CLBBB but the tricuspid regurgitation is a good indicator of cardiac involvement in PNP. Furthermore, the presence of PEDs and large atria is thought to be a marker of poor prognosis and presents with arrhythmias. The prevalence of PAP that was associated with CLBBB was high in the present study. We assumed that the high proportion of CLBBB was attributable to the pathophysiology and presence of common echocardiographic findings. First, all of our subjects had been diagnosed as PNP by the appropriate specialists. Second, the lupus anticoagulant was detected in 6 (13.3%) of the 45 patients. The incidence of lupus anticoagulant in Japanese patients with PNP was 3.3% \[[@pone.0216670.ref010]\]. The observed difference in the prevalence of lupus anticoagulant between the current study and the previous report might be attributed to the difference in the number of patients and the methods used to detect lupus anticoagulant. We, however, detected the lupus anticoagulant according to a previously described method \[[@pone.0216670.ref006]\]. Third, lupus
