I'm working on a bash script that needs to show the desktop of the current logged in user in the CLI. This is just a simple checklist for me to make sure I'm doing what I need to, so I would like to do something simple like this: whoami | desktop Which doesn't work. desktop isn't a command and I can't find any other way to display a desktop file without having the system displaying the home directory of the current user. Is there a really straightforward way to display a desktop file from the CLI? A: Desktop files are like any other files on a system — they're files, not commands. They're most typically found in $HOME, or possibly in the $HOME/Desktop directory or something similar. You may
