Zen: A Gay Sequel Coloring Book

The game Zen: A Gay Sequel opens up the world of Greek life, drag queens and the Art of Love as a gay male leads his boyfriend, Adam, on the adventure of a lifetime. As a bright new student in Hope Mills, Adam is determined to enjoy his time at college and find his people within the weird subculture of the University of Love, all while missing his best friend and crush, Mark. With only one night until the annual Greek Ball, Adam takes on a zillion responsibilities that threaten to turn his life upside down. The driving force behind this adventure is our protagonist, Adam, a gay male student who came out to his best friend, Mark, earlier this semester. Since then, he has struggled through love, loss and all-around confusion. But now, instead of searching for a love that never existed, Adam must look to himself to heal his heart. The game captures life as a gay man today in a humorous way and gives players the opportunity to explore the darker side of love and friendships as we continue our series in gaming after more than 25 years. Opinions on the game will be shared in a short story written by the game's writer, Jack Marks. On the home screen of his smartphone, Yo Joe, 31, can pick out certain people's cells and then start barking out commands. Since the app was released last week, it's been downloaded more than 20,000 times and tweeted about by a handful of Twitter users, Nettone tells Business Insider. "This is just a funny idea," he says. "So I downloaded the app." Nettone figured the app would just let him know who was nearby with his phone. Instead, when you touch the app on your android phone, it starts sending messages that change depending on whether the person has the app on their phone as well. Nettone says the first thing you get a dog barking at you is a little message saying where you and the person you're talking to are, and where they're heading. On the next tapped that's in the middle, the command will be bark. You can also just swipe on the screen to be barked at. It's a joke, designed to get attention and rally the app's fan base, Nettone says. "I have the same idea with another app. And another app. But I won't demo it to you." The app also shows who else is nearby.

Nettone knows if a lot of people are walking in this direction or that, because he can see who is walking near his phone, it would be impossible for him to send everyone the command. "I cannot send a message to everyone," he says. In the future, the aim is to add location detection outside people's phones. It's a feature the team is working on, but at this moment it's a very unfinished version, Nettone says. CNET's Richard Nieva contributed to
