Friday, August 30, 2015 Back to the Root To tell you the truth, my weekend started off pretty spectacularly. On Thursday, I got to spend several hours with my daughter while her mom was at work. Of course, it got even more interesting as the day wore on and Ashley was fired up and ready to go. By Friday afternoon, Ashley had still been blowing off steam about the situation. Then, it dawned on me that I missed her. I missed this delightful little person. I wanted her to be able to find a peaceful, comfortable place to cool down, and that was in me. So, I kind of became a dog show dog, "I'm fine, I'm fine!" I was feeling aggrieved that she was a bit peppy and loud, and I was a bit stressed about it. So, I left her several places in the house, and told her that it would be fine if she ran and did whatever. I left her in the house as I went in to get the keys for my car. Then, in the last few minutes of my weekend, I went to unlock my car and saw a significant amount of fluff and dog hair in the car. I didn't know I was missing my daughter so much that it was affecting my car, but I suppose I should have. I felt a combination of embarrassment and anger at her inactivity as I sat in the car. Since I had locked it, it was very obvious that we were not alone. I was worried about my beloved car, and I was about to get angry. Then, I started singing "The Night Before Christmas" in my mind. I realized that I don't care if the car is damaged or dented. My car is a friend. After singing that, I heard a dog whistle. I realized it was Ashley. I started driving faster, and it was like a dam had broken in my heart. I was laughing and crying as I drove home, and I haven't laughed or cried like that in ages. When I made it home, I turned on the lights and looked in the back seat. Ashley wasn't there, but the space was covered with dog hair. I looked around the garage and there it was, spread across the floor in all its glory. I looked at the inside of the car and there was Ashley, in the back seat, sleeping. It was clearly an out-of-the-way spot that she found, and was using
