©2019 Steelseries LTD. All Rights Reserved. # STEELSERIES STEELSERIESQ: How to reuse PWA on different devices? I have a PWA (Progressive Web App) that I have implemented. It has a navigation bar on top that when I click on it, I navigate to another web page. When I tested this on a smartphone, it worked fine. However, when I tested it on a laptop, it failed to perform the navigation (i.e., the web page never loads). I already found out that on my laptop, the PWA is not doing a server-side redirect but does a client-side redirect. I tried to click on the navigation bar a couple of times but the PWA behaves the same way. What do I need to do in order to get a proper client-side redirect from the PWA? A: Structure of a Progressive Web App service-worker.js index.html (Webhook) service-worker.js (Webhook) service-worker.js The Service Worker code is installed in service-worker.js in the same folder as your index.html service-worker.js self.addEventListener('install', event => { // Only install the app if it was not already installed if (!self.skipWaiting()) { event.waitUntil(caches.open('my-progressive-app-cache').then(cache => { return cache.addAll(['/index.html', '/service-worker.js', '/favicon.ico']));

Liquid chromatography-mass spectrometry-based targeted metabolomics method for novel hepatoprotective and anti-steatotic evaluation of traditional medicinal herbs in mice. The present study aimed to develop a sensitive, accurate and fast LC-MS/MS-based metabolomics method for simultaneous characterization of novel hepatoprotective and anti-steatotic herbal drugs used in traditional Chinese medicine, and hence, to investigate their hepatoprotective and anti-steatotic mechanisms. Hepatoprotective herbal drugs and anti-steatotic herbal drugs such as puerarin and (-)-epicatechin (EC), were characterized by a LC-MS/MS metabolomics method comprising of two parts: (1) the study of 14 endogenous metabolites, including lipids, amino acids, organic acids, and purines, in serum and liver tissues of mice from control and herbal drug intervention groups, and (2) the identification of the metabolites of interest. These herbal drugs were also confirmed by post-mortem histopathology of the liver. The metabolomic data revealed that all herbal drugs down-regulated the levels of cholesterol, carnitine and cholic acid, decreased the activities of mitochondrial oxidative phosphorylation complexes (MVCP, VCP), and improved ATP level in the liver. Besides, the herbal drugs up-regulated the level of tyrosine and down-regulated the activity of hydroxymethylglutaryl CoA synthase and inhibitory activity of protein glycation. The present study showed a novel metabolomics approach to evaluate the effects of herb-medicine(s) on animal models from different biological processes, providing the basic data and basis for further development and application of natural products in clinical
