Core@shell structured nanoparticles (NPs) could significantly improve the catalytic activity and detectability of the detected substances because of the nanoscale size effect, the high-surface area, the synergistic effect of the inner and the outer components, and the confinement effect. Herein, Co3O4/Ag core@shell 3D flower-like NPs were prepared by a low temperature solid-state reaction at room temperature and subsequently employed as a dual-functioned platform for the amplification of the signal and the analysis of the interferences. The Co3O4/Ag N
