some liquid to reduce frictional forces or friction between two contacting surfaces. The most useful liquid for this purpose is a liquid having a lower viscosity than the surfaces and less chemical reactivity than the surfaces.
This liquid or “lubricant” remains in the region between the surfaces until the surfaces become worn, so that there is no intrusion of foreign matter. When necessary, the lubricant is removed and replaced with fresh lubricant. One example of a very useful class of lubricants is the class of synthetic hydrocarbon lubricants. These synthetic hydrocarbon lubricants have viscosity and chemical compatibility necessary to function well as a lubricant. They can be formulated to be chemically and biochemically inert, and therefore are useful in the lubrication of most surfaces. Synthetic hydrocarbon lubricants have superior performance characteristics over naturally-derived lubricants, but they are typically less biodegradable than natural lubricants and they will persist in a contaminated environment.

Attempts have been made in the art to make hydrocarbon lubricants biodegradable. For example, U.S. Pat. No. 6,248,335 discloses a lubricant composition comprising a lubricant of the formula C_nH_{2n+2} and a biodegradable polymer, wherein $n=4-14$, preferably
