that he will stand for the national anthem, but the Jags probably shouldn't count on it. Ramsey has said he won't stand for the anthem and sent a letter to the NFL's general manager to that effect: "Last year, some patriots' messages to me were not respectful, yet I stood for the national anthem. That is something I will continue to do so until there is a constitutional amendment that protects our country and her people. I believe what happened in Charlottesville was wrong, and I'm not a white nationalist, I don't promote violence, I'm not a hateful person. But this is a country built on the oppression and lynching of black people. "As a young man, I grew up in a black neighborhood. To be honest, I'm not sure what it's like to not have that. It didn't matter where I went, there were always people that hated me and didn't respect me. This country is the greatest country in the world, but I fear for my people because I see a country that is divided. I see people that have lost hope, I see hatred in their eyes. I see a country that has lost their way. I will never stand for the National Anthem. I will never stand for the KKK, I will never stand for the oppression of any race or religion or any human. I won't be a part of it." The NFL said it would suspend Ramsey for the first game of the season if he doesn't stand for the anthem, which Ramsey said he won't do. The letter and the threat of suspension apparently had a small effect on his determination to stand with arms locked at his side.
