Dusty seeds such as those of the western juniper, and those often used for tracking, travel far slower than the winds that carry them. The breeze allows them time to hang in the air, snapping open and making wind-assisted seed dispersal possible. The question of when and why the winds get so strong to raise the seeds has long intrigued observers. "Seed dispersal by the wind is not known to be the dominant mechanism of seed dispersion in the absence of animal dispersers," scientist Matthew Metz of the Northern Arizona University, Flagstaff, said. "Elevated winds lead to the dispersal of seeds by sand and grit, which are major factors in the spatial distribution of many plants." Metz led a team that included researchers from three countries and the universities of California-Davis and Michigan-Ann Arbor. Metz and his colleagues created experiments in which seed-
