Field of the Invention This invention relates to nonthermal plasma processing, specifically to a light weight compact plasmatray that produces a uniform plasma. 2. Discussion of Prior Art A plasma is a high temperature ionized gas in which electrons are stripped off and in which ions are free to move in a drift through the plasma. Plasma "forms" when a large number of electrons are sufficiently heated to overcome their mutual repulsion. A plasma is also a type of gas disassociation. Plasma may be formed in at least two ways. A. Electrical arcing across a gap in a discharge path creates a positive space charge near the anode and a negative space charge near the cathode. The ambient gas becomes ionized, or electron deficient, near the anode. At the cathode, the bulk gas fills in the gap created by the electrons moving towards the cathode. This situation is described in an article entitled "Plasma Discharges: Their Operation and Some of Their Consequences", by P. G. Neilson, J. I. Castillo, and E. A. Galushina, published in the IEEE Transactions on Plasma Science, Vol. PS-11, No. 3, May 1983. When the amount of electrons remove more electrons from the gas to create a plasma. B. An electric field, either externally applied or self-induced, creates the plasma. The field ionizes the gas and induces a current to flow between the electrons. Several problems are associated with creating plasma in a reactor. Since plasma is a gas, it hat carries a negative potential. The electric field in the gas creates the desired plasma. Several problems are associated with creating plasma in a reactor. Since plasma is a gas, it is inefficient to enclose it in a chamber, as is usually the case. Also, because of its violent nature, plasma con demage or destroy equipment in its way. It is important
