My husband has beaten the streets of Santa Monica, San Diego, and other cities, dozens of times to find cops to press charges on guys who have assaulted us. This time, he has had to go home. His car was broken into two weeks ago while we were in Arizona. A red Stutz parked right outside the door. We drove home from the airport this morning, only to find it ransacked. The thief took most everything of value. Please help! Authorities say they cannot pick the case up until his car is found. —L. C., California I don't know if you remember, but you asked for help recently to help a married woman in a similar situation in Texas. The cops in that town have been hiding from her because they have no jurisdiction over her alleged rapist. This time, he did his laundry at her house. She got to her car to take it to the laundry and he ambushed her. I would like to suggest a few courses of action. —Neal Surely most men would understand the humiliation and humiliation when you are a victim of rape and the cops dismiss your complaint because they're not in the area. If you do go to the police, ask them to work on this separately from other crimes in their jurisdiction, as opposed to colluding with the "other crimes" police who usually don't want to help rape victims. Some will be able to help and will agree to do so in a special unit in your city. Others will call their district attorney and ask him to investigate. You will also have to be available and do what is necessary to get police records to prove that the car was broken into. All of this should be done well before the statute of limitations runs out. Here's one idea: You might also find that every city of 500,000 or more has a special unit for rape. This would include Berkley, Oakland, San Francisco, Richmond, Denver, Honolulu, Washington, Portland, Los Angeles, San Diego, Phoenix, Seattle, etc. It should go without saying that if you know the real perpetrator, don't go to the police. Don't even press charges. c6a93da74d
