We're at the beginning of a new era in wearable technology. Cell phone screens and watches - even smart-watches - are relatively small and relatively easy to travel with. But the latest wave of wearable technology is bigger. It's bulky, too,

and also tough to wear for long periods of time.

For most people, a smart-watch will always be a fashion accessory.

Where technology is concerned, fashion trumps practicality. Even though tech-wear has been around for quite some time, wearable technology has only recently started to mature.

---

Starting with fitness trackers, people started to realize that an always-on computer in our pocket is no longer a necessity. It's now a luxury item. Wearable technology will only increase in popularity over the next few years, as more and more "smart" devices start appearing. It's difficult for technologists to dream up new uses for wearable tech, though. If you're looking for ideas, you can start with sports. First, there's the always-on heart rate monitor. For athletes, it's a way to track how well they are performing. In some extreme cases, it's even used to examine a runner's heart for signs of heart attacks. In the future, we can also expect smaller and more hidden fitness trackers. Imagine a smart-watch with a GPS system that can tell you where you should run if you're out in the middle of nowhere. As we start to start moving away from GPS, wearable tech can also reveal other interesting bits of information. If you could put a smart-watch on your sleep apnea monitor, it could tell you if you were waking up and breathing normally. If you could put a smart-watch on a defibrillator, it would let you know if your heart was about to stop and send you the medicine to keep you alive. Unfortunately, the wearable industry is not without its flaws.

---

---

---

---

Despite a great amount of hype, smartphones have traditionally had weak hardware.

Wearable tech is no different. Most wrist-mounted tech today has weak cameras, weak processors, and low-res displays. A smart-watch that can do anything other than a phone is still far beyond the capacities of most of the wrist-wearable tech out there today. The good news is that this could change. In the next few years,

---

---

we can expect wearable
tech to start achieving parity with smartphones. Cameras
will get better,
processors will get
faster, and screen
resolutions will get higher. This year, we
