It's been a while since I work with Lightroom. A lot has changed since the last time I reviewed the program. Fortunately, there haven't been any significant changes. The most notable change was the move to a new and improved In-Place editing mode. It's a lot more intuitive, and never more so than in the Tumble feature. This is a really powerful tool that makes it easy to work with multiple images in the same place. I would have appreciated sound options in the Test Tone screen in LR. I really rely on having the ability to simply tell the system to play white noise at a particular volume or pitch in the background of the screen, while I concentrate on post-processing activities. Plus, you can apply various filters, effects, and any number of adjustments in Test Tone in LR. It's a useful feature that I wish more software offered. Apart from that, I think it's great that the integration between Lightroom and Photoshop is now tighter than ever. You can even export images directly from Lightroom to Photoshop, in a snap. However, it comes at the cost of a lower capacity capacity. Having fewer cores in the background for instance, the performance varies a little, depending on the number and size of the images being processed. As a word of advice, give it a try before you buy. Fix your workflow and then use images from other sources to evaluate the results. All software becomes irrelevant if you're not satisfied with your efforts. There really aren't many changes in the update besides export and integration. For those working in the Develop module, the option to set a specific de-mosaic method in the De-mosaic Panorama dialog is welcomed.

The power and simplicity of the most popular photo and video editor in the world are now available in a browser thanks to the release of Share for Review (beta), a new collaboration mode that brings Photoshop to the web. Whether you're working on images in a browser, on your phone or by sharing from your desktop app, Share for Review makes it easy for teammates to review your work while you maintain full control over your original file. Think of Share for Review as a real-time cloud-based version of review site, where you can show clients, web teams and family members what you've done without having to worry about file access and sharing. Through the beta release of Share for Review, sharing and collaboration can be seamless. You can start by opening an image in Photoshop and immediately begin sharing the changes you're making in the browser (see how to get started here). The web app can also be used to send high-resolution images from the gallery straight to clients or your inbox via email, and it's free to use – so you won't have to worry about your work being relied on too much. The browser-based sharing experience is powered by Adobe Edge and the files you share are protected using industry-standard PGP encryption, which protects the original file across computers and methods, so you're working with a safe copy. Also, Share for Review works with a wide range of browsers, including Chrome, Firefox, Safari or Opera, and it's compatible with almost every mobile browser – so your team can work on images from any device.
