The new version of Photoshop does have some improvements. In terms of the content, you may stay with the older version, but new features such as the Photoshop Camera Raw plugin can now be downloaded just from the Internet. They are no longer physically installed. The editor now has a single user interface. Other new features are automated corrections and the touch tool. These small enhancements may be less than you'll expect from the description, but just remember that Photoshop is the world's most powerful photo editor. There are programs out there that have much more sophisticated and less automated features in spite of their pricier price tag. However, what Adobe has achieved here makes enough of a splash that it has better than anything comparable to Photoshop's current offering in terms of price. With respect to the look of the application, there have been changes that Adobe has not completely explained. By default, you no longer get new brushes and filters or the choices for new ones. This was of course understandable, because this update fixes a couple of rather major performance issues. But Adobe has not only "borrowed" the choices made by the user in Photoshop CS6 and not made them available in the new Lightroom. Similar to the Creative Cloud edition of Photoshop, the default looks and layout of the program has been completely redone. It's a bit jarring, somewhat negative change, but if you're a loyal Photoshop user, you should probably give it a chance. If you are a Lightroom user, you should not be too worried.
