It is well documented that up to 40% of adolescents in the U.S. begin to drink alcohol before the age of 13 years. While there is good reason to believe that alcohol use during adolescence is a risk factor for the development of a myriad of adolescent psychopathology, little is known about the biological correlates and mechanisms by which alcohol use during adolescence impacts on developing psychopathology. Recent findings from our laboratory demonstrate that adolescents who take up early alcohol use have changes in brain structure and function, which are consistent with those changes associated with increased risk for future alcohol use.

Understanding the neural mechanisms that underpin adolescents who take up early alcohol use is therefore crucial to our ability to develop prevention and treatment strategies that are able to prevent the development of alcohol use disorders. This application proposes to use functional MRI as a means to examine brain regions thought to underlie vulnerability to alcohol use and abuse. This pilot study will use a cross-sectional design to examine three groups of adolescents: alcohol users, matched non-users and an anxious-depressive group matched on age and sex to the alcohol users. The first aim of this project is to examine the regional brain response of adolescents to alcohol by comparing the regional brain response of the three groups to alcohol and placebo. This aim will determine whether there is a difference
